

Finding that Fuzzy Spotlight

What's the secret to Internet Stardom? Will my middle age limit the number of followers I can attract? Do my retweets even break triple digits? If you have these questions, Boy do I have answers for you. That is, if you're a dog. After a recent investigation into the We Rate Dogs twitter account, I've got my paws on a few trends that might aid you in your quest for furry fandom. First off, it's best to submit your manicured poodle portfolio between 7 and 11 pm. This is when the twitter page tends to be active, but low on posting count. At the stroke of midnight, furry explosion of productivity tends to happen, with the highest rate of posts between 12 and 3 am.

It's best to be a teenage Puppo. This group has the highest average rating, with a tremendous 11.952. Interestingly, they have the second highest retweets, racking up an average of 6339 retweets. Don't fret if you're showing a few gray hairs in your coat, though. The teenage Puppo group is right on the Puppo's Tail. They rate at 11.926 on average, scarcely .03 below Puppis. They have the upper paw in average retweet count, outpacing Puppis by 650 average retweets. As backwards as it seems, the fledgling Puppis group seems to have the most trouble creating an internet reputation. They fall a full point behind Doggos in rating, and aren't even close to the retweet levels, with only 36% of the average retweets. That's 4300 retweets they're missing out on. I suppose they still have some growing up to do before they can handle internet fame. One other thing is for certain, if you're a mature Doggo, cut that hair! Doggos with that floofer styling lose .9 points in rating, and have their retweets cut in half. If you're an old dog with a wild mane of fur, it's time to learn some new tricks.